

SandPro OMP: Quick Update for Merci

Plain-English summary of the latest cleanup and testing focus

Hi Merci - here is the quick version of what was tightened up so you can help test the platform with confidence. The goal is simple: make the app easier to understand, easier to maintain, and less likely to surprise you during real SandPro work.

What changed

- You can now help maintain the Organization page. You should be able to update names, titles, departments, and who someone reports to.
- Platform role changes are still protected. Day-to-day org cleanup is available to you, but deeper access changes stay limited to executive admins.
- Helpful in-app tips were added for new workflows. Each tip can be closed, and then reopened later from a small question-mark help button.
- Objective tagging and workflow guidance is clearer, including when to tag a teammate, when to use the workflow tracker, and when to mention someone in a message.
- File, Daily Brief, and notification areas now include short guidance so the app explains what to do without needing a separate training call.
- Additional validation checks were added so permissions, help prompts, login recovery, and release basics are tested before changes are handed off.

What this means for you

- If Jake or Andrew asks for org chart cleanup, you should be able to do that directly from the Organization page.
- When a feature is new or unfamiliar, look for the short tip card or the small question-mark button.
- If something does not work the way the tip says it should, treat that as useful beta feedback and send it over right away.

What is coming next

A longer roadmap is being prepared for Jake, Andrew, and you. It will lay out the next phase in plain English: cleaner notifications, better mobile use, the workflow tracker, file/export improvements, org chart cleanup, and the path toward a wider SandPro team rollout.

Prepared for internal SandPro OMP beta coordination.